U.S. will no longer enforce mask mandate on airplanes, trains after court ruling

(Reuters) - The Biden administration will no longer enforce a U.S. mask mandate on public transportation, after a federal judge in Florida on Monday ruled that the 14-month-old directive was unlawful, overturning a key White House effort to reduce the spread of COVID-19.

Delta, United, Southwest and American Airlines have said masks are now optional for travelers aboard their aircraft. In addition, Uber has also announced that masks are now optional.
